Why not a distributed operating system? - Inguyen Why didn't the creators of Linux fork it? Why was it later taken over by Red Hat?The Linux kernel is open source, so it's pretty much free, right? On the other hand, Red Hat doesn't make money from the Linux kernel. It makes money from selling support, training, and the integration of the Linux kernel into its products. ====== ivankirigin Why not a Wordpress for OSes? :) The difference is that the kernel has actually been used for real things (to run operating systems) by most distributions, like Ubuntu, while Wordpress is less practical for anything but dynamic blogs. ——— gabriel The founders of Linux didn't want to fork it. At that time Red Hat wasn't the only Linux distribution. They wanted it to be _better_. It took until Linux kernel 2.6 for the development of the project to really start. The use of the word fork is almost poetic. If they were to fork it, it would mean that Linux' development became an independent branch. What the people involved were referring to was "take over." As in, in order for Linux to really benefit from all of the other projects out there, it had to be "merged" back to the big linux project. ——— michaelneale Of course there were other distributions and certainly, at the beginning the kernel needed love. But then there were just too many implementations of the same thing and a lot of them had their own pet peeves. Heck, at the time, Linus said that he "gave it up" and just started developing his own. Why, I cannot guess. Perhaps he just wanted to make sure it was working properly for OSX. After that it just seemed to progress because there was a requirement. Its
