I just found a document which is creating by XAF very interesting, however there is no any native XAF engine. Does WPF support an XAF native rendering engine? A: In summary, not directly, not yet. XAF is a platform-independent engine, very similar to Direct2D. WPF is an abstraction layer over native windows. WPF cannot render on it's own, at least not directly. You can bind an XAF backend to WPF, however, and thus both can render to eachother's window. The question is if you want to do what XAF can do. It's a very powerful engine, which you can bind to with 3rd party plugins and can be easily extended with 3rd party plugins. If you want to be able to render XAF directly to a windows host, you would need to abstract the windows API behind your plugin, but that's pretty much what you do with WPF. I think the better option would be to use a GUI toolkit (e.g. SWT) which handles all this for you and lets you be a good coder. In the spirit of your question, I don't think that rendering directly to a surface has much advantages over rendering to a surface through a plugin. Because it's complex to use the platform's functionality correctly, it's probably easier to do it in a generic way.
