The machines are from 3D Systems, and the academic project comes under the Data-Driven Innovation for Mobile Devices and Research on Autonomous Driving (Developed in Germany), a project funded by the German Federal Ministry of Education and Research and the General Directorate for Artificial Intelligence and Robotics and System Integration in the Department of Computer Science at the Technical University of Munich. One of the machines was purchased by Thomas Boyer, an assistant professor of mechanical engineering who is working on his Ph.D. thesis at USC. Boyer works with students who have an interest in embedded systems, such as systems that need to be small and have a low power supply, which is just about everything. “We can 3D print a prototype in about three hours,” he said. “We can do it on paper and then tweak it a little bit to improve the print resolution. Then we can test it on our 3D printer.” The other two 3D printing machines were purchased by John Davis, a professor of construction management and architectural engineering and the director of USC’s joint project in construction management, and Don Wagner, an associate professor in the university’s department of architecture and building, who also serves as the director of the USC/Beaufort campus’s Smart Cities and Smart Government Innovation Center.

From the 3D printing machines, the cadets are working on an educational project in which they produce a prototype for an APlastic shop tool that could become a very useful item for some shops, including those in a hospital. The idea is to make a tool that fits in a drill press that will allow the user to make a hole for a threaded fastener as fast as using a standard drill. The idea is to use it in an operating room. The cadets in the effort are Andrew Maness, David Hay
