I have an Rspec test that I need to execute. The problem I'm running into is that the class I need for the model has some dependencies on some other models that I'm not sure how to configure. Example: define_model "test" do # if "people" is populated, I need the "Person" # model to be populated end I could define the class in another file and just try instantiating it, but I'd like to have the class available so I don't have to repeat the same code. Thanks! A: If you're working with Rails 4, you can use self.class.const_set to define the model as a constant. The first argument should be the fully qualified name of the class, as if it were defined in the traditional manner, and the second is the name of the constant you want to define. (This is the same technique one would use in any other language to define constants.) For example: # These lines make the Person model's name available in the # example module (i.e. the model you're defining) via # self.class.const_get('Person').name self.class.const_set('Person', self.class.const_get('Person')) The therapeutic potential of isoflurane and xenon in conscious and tranquilized rats. The authors compared the effects of isoflurane (I) and xenon (X) on the electroencephalogram (EEG), heart rate (HR), and blood pressure (BP) in conscious and urethane-chloralose-anesthetized rats. To provide isoflurane and xenon anesthesia, the inhalation chambers were filled with 2% and 96% X, respectively, at steady flow rates of 0.8 L/min. Conscious rats were
