languageManchester United are willing to meet Philippe Coutinho's £90million release clause after becoming increasingly confident the Barcelona star will leave the Nou Camp. Coutinho scored 24 goals in all competitions for Barca last season and United consider him the best attacking midfielder in the world, yet they are prepared to let the 22-year-old leave in the summer for £180m. Real Madrid and Juventus have also been credited with an interest, but United believe the vast fee would be worth it to reinforce their squad. Coutinho, who joined Barcelona from Inter Milan for £8m in 2011, has agreed personal terms with the Catalan club. [?][?][?]

a macro is a device for remote control of programs. It is similar to a Unix shell function but it is executed by a remote program. Unlike shell functions, macros are executed as a function without the need to provide any remote shell. ReXX provides a variety of ways to invoke macros. Two of the most common ways to invoke macros are: `%macro some_macro(arg)`
This is an example of a macro.

`%end` The macro is defined in a single line of Rexx code, with the macro label and any arguments on the same line. A `%macro` statement contains an optional if-then-else construct and a macro invocation. Macro arguments follow the if-then-else construct, but are executed before the macro invocation. The invocation of the macro is a list of source lines that start with a `%macro` statement followed by an optional if-then-else construct, and an optional macro argument list. The argument list is a comma-separated list of macro arguments. Macro arguments are NOT evaluated, but they are passed to the macro. Like many programming languages, REXX supports macros to facilitate many useful features. A macro can be written to perform any of the following actions: execute a single macro invocation execute a single macro statement execute a list of macro statements You can also write macros to perform all of the following: write macros to perform some actions receive macros from remote programs Using KEYMACRO The example of KEYMACRO presented below demonstrates the use of a macro. REM REXX program to print a message. %let i=1; %let msg=Hello %do i=1 %to 10; %let msg=%str(&msg)%char(10) %do j=1 %to i; %str(" %int(&j); %end; %str(")%str(&msg) %end
