Using density functional theory calculations, we have studied the adsorption of thiols and nitriles on supported monodispersed Pd nanoparticles. The reactivity of Pd-nanoparticles has been found to be significantly higher for nitriles than for thiols, which has been attributed to the presence of a strong chemisorption pathway for nitriles, which completely avoids dissociative adsorption. Our calculations reveal that the dissociative pathway is induced by the presence of sufficient Pd-S covalent bonding, which drives the attached alkane molecule to dissociate from the Pd-nanoparticle. The energy gain from breaking the Pd-S bond is the main driving force for the dissociation. Alternatively, in the case of thiols, an atomically rearranged thiolate dissociates from the Pd-nanoparticle, resulting in a bond breaking in the Pd nanoparticle, which is followed by a subsequent rearrangement of the adsorbed thiolate, with a subsequent release of a hydrogen atom from the surface of the Pd-nanoparticle. We find that this reaction pathway is more favorable than dissociative adsorption for Pd-nanoparticles. It is shown that the latter pathway proceeds via direct dissociation of the alkane molecule from the Pd-nanoparticle. The kinetic barrier for the reaction is estimated to be around 30 kcal mol⁻¹.Q: Appending an item to a playlist in iTunes via AppleScript I have a link to an MP3 file.
