--- abstract: 'Heterogeneous networks (HetNets) are deployed increasingly across the world, providing higher capacity for different traffic types. They incorporate base-stations, macro-cell eNodeB (MeNB), and small cell eNodeB (SeNB). Analysis of the electromagnetic (EM) field surrounding the network is a crucial step towards characterizing the EM interferences induced by the HetNet cells. In this paper, we study the EM propagation inside and around the HetNet of an LTE-advanced network, considered as a representative case to describe any other macro-cell base-station connected to a multilayer (up to nine) small cell network. We exploit the proximity of the small cell eNBs to the macro-cell base-stations for evaluating the EM energy, computed using the Hybrid Toolbox in MATLAB. The results we get for the EE of the small cells as a function of the ratio between the power of the macro and the small cells show that the small cell network enhances the EE by approximately 15%. We extend the analysis of the EM propagation to further layers of the network, where we find that the layer where a small cell is located decreases the level of interference in the mid layer. This approach presents two main advantages: (1) it is practical and (2) it gives insight into the impact of small cell deployment on the network performance. Indeed, it can be applied to other geographical settings as well.' author: - bibliography: - '/articled.bib' title: 'Spectrum Efficient Heterogeneous Networks: Small Cell Deployment, Interference and Energy' --- HetNet, base-stations, interference, energy, small cells, LTE-advanced, MATLAB. In pressurized water nuclear reactors, it is necessary to utilize a reactor coolant that is under pressure, and to circulate this pressurized coolant, in order to transport heat from the reactor core of the nuclear reactor. The coolant, which is under pressure, is circulated through a closed circuit, and the heat from the reactor core is transported by this pressurized coolant. The heat from the reactor core then heats a water/steam circuit which in turn produces steam for driving a turbine generator. The water/steam circuit is constructed as a sub-system of the pressurized coolant circuit. The water/steam circuit includes a number of internals, such as fuel assemblies
