Our purpose was to assess whether prostate cancer is diagnosed more frequently in smokers than in nonsmokers, and, if so, to investigate the possible mechanisms underlying this effect. In-patient cases of newly diagnosed prostate cancer seen from 1990 to 1994 at Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center were retrieved. Data on use of tobacco and other lifestyle factors were obtained by a selfadministered questionnaire, and medical records were reviewed to confirm history of tobacco use and to obtain information on clinical characteristics, treatment, and outcome. A total of 611 patients were identified; 569 were interviewed and classified as smokers (n = 210) or nonsmokers (n = 359). Prostate cancer was found in 1.8% of patients who had never smoked and in 8.6% of patients who had previously smoked, but the difference was not statistically significant (95% confidence interval, -5.6 to +2.2). The relative risk of prostate cancer was higher in smokers than in nonsmokers only among the 16% (n = 48) of patients who were heavy smokers (intensity of smoking > 10 pack-years). The risk increased with increased duration of tobacco use: current smokers, relative risk = 2.7 (95% confidence interval, 1.5 to 5.1) versus current smokers who had quit, relative risk = 1.0 (95% confidence interval, 0.1 to 8.0). The higher relative risk of prostate cancer in smokers is probably due, at least in part, to differences in the age at diagnosis of prostatic neoplasia between smokers and nonsmokers. Hematopoietic growth factors induce the growth and differentiation of myeloid progenitors. Cytokines, such as erythropoietin and granulocyte-macrophage colony-stimulating factor, are involved in the regulation of erythroid, megakaryocytic, and granulocytic progenitor proliferation and differentiation. Our objective was to study the effects of these hematopoietic growth factors on the growth and differentiation of
