hypercaloric diets and body weight gain in growing rats: effects of methionine intake and of methionine and tryptophan mixture. Adult growing rats were fed for 6 weeks a hypercaloric diet in which the caloric content (23.0 kJ/g diet) was provided by sucrose (58.4%), fat (25.2%), lard (8.4%), protein (8.4%) and NaCl (0.4%). Different methionine and tryptophan dietary intakes were studied in their effects on body weight gain and on blood and liver methionine and tryptophan concentrations (methionine/tryptophan ratio: ratio [MT]). The methionine intake was adequate or overloaded in the diet (MT 2.8 versus 4.8%). With overloaded methionine, the changes in blood methionine and tryptophan levels were inflight, whereas they were more pronounced with a decrease in MT. With adequate methionine, blood methionine decreased but tryptophan concentrations rose. In the liver, the amounts of methionine and tryptophan did not change when MT was adequate but they decreased when MT was overloaded. These results suggest that an adequate MT intake has a positive effect on the competition between methionine and tryptophan for uptake and intracellular store in the liver and on the control of energy intake. For this purpose, methionine appears to have a more efficient role in growing animals.1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an electric-component mounting system, and more particularly to an electric-component mounting system for mounting an electric component on a base material,
