The association between mutagenic DNA G-quadruplexes and carcinogenesis is well established. This study reports the detection of a G-quadruplex forming sequence motif in human intron 1 of the tyrosine kinase Fyn (FYN). G-quadruplex-forming DNA sequences were detected within the intron when aligned against published Fyn mRNAs. Formation of G-quadruplexes was verified by using a colorimetric single-stranded DNA-selective probe, a thermostability shift protocol, and an electrophoretic mobility shift assay. G-quadruplexes formed under physiological conditions in human cell-free lysate and nuclear extract as well as in K562 total-RNA extracts could be detected using the single-stranded DNA-selective probe. The Fyn-B388026A single-stranded DNA selectivity was attributed to the G-rich region present in the intron sequence 5' of the guanine tetrad located in the intron G-tetrad, which was present at higher frequency than in reported Fyn G-tracts, as hypothesized. The G-rich intron PQS was also shown to affect protein expression, as demonstrated by a decrease in Fyn transcriptional activity after Fyn gene transfection. The Fyn-G-rich intragenic 5' untranslated sequence was proposed to play a role in splicing and/or protein expression. Given the global prevalence of G-quadruplexes in intragenic sequences and the proposed biological functions of Fyn-G-rich tracts, this work implies a novel role of the G-quadruplex motif in human biology.
