Progressing, then, people may well be wondering what this technology does in more detail. Well, it turns out that the system is capable of detecting where a player is on the pitch, as well as the direction of the run and hence their speed, the initial position they are in, their height above the ground, their “weight transfer” when tackling (i.e. how far they are lifted off the ground), which foot is used to attack and at what angle it is directed, etc. It also allows you to see where the ball is, and if it is crossed or dribbled, the user can be given either a defender interception or a pass. If this technology were ever to hit the streets as its developers promise, it could make the game so much better. EA and Adidas promise this to be possible “within the next year.”

Q: Android: creating a list view, arrayAdapter? I'm trying to create a listview from a custom class. I think I need to set the list adapter after the list view is created. My question is: How do I add all the objects of my custom class object to the list view?

class Data extends ListActivity { private ArrayList itemArray = new ArrayList(); public void onCreate(Bundle icle) { super.onCreate(icle); setContentView(R.layout.main); ArrayAdapter adp = new ArrayAdapter(this, android.R.layout.simple_list_item_1, itemArray); setListAdapter(adp); } @Override protected void onItemClick(ListView l, View v, int position, long id) { super.onItemClick

Power semiconductor devices capable of switching at high currents and high frequencies, such as power transistors and power diodes, are needed for a wide variety of applications including power supplies, circuit protection, control, and electric power distribution. In many applications, it is desirable for a semiconductor switch to include both high voltage blocking capability and fast switching speed. For example, electronic circuits require high power switching and blocking for devices such as AC to DC power converters. A variety of power semiconductor devices have been developed to carry large currents, withstand high voltages and switch at high frequencies. One type of power semiconductor device is the thyristor. A thyristor is a three-terminal, pnpn semiconductor device consisting of four p regions, four n regions and one p-n-p thyristor junction. Thyristors are used in power switching applications, and in particular in combination with gate drive circuitry to control the "on" and "off" states. A typical thyristor is illustrated in FIG. 1. Referring to FIG. 1, a cross-sectional view of a prior art thyristor 100 is shown. Thyristor 100 comprises an n base layer 104 overlying an n+ buffer layer 102. Base layer 104 is generally of n conductivity type and buffer layer 102 is generally of p conductivity type. An n+ emitter layer 106 is formed in a p well 108 in n base layer 104. Emitter layer 106 extends from the surface of n base layer 104 to the upper boundary of p well 108. A metal region 110 is formed on the upper surface of p well 108 to provide ohmic contact to emitter layer 106. In operation, em
