A: The problem is your hard drive is failing - the number of bad sectors you are reporting is proving that. Your best bet is to ensure your drive is backed up off your computer before it fails. If the drive is still in warranty, your drive manufacturer will replace it. If not, you may be able to find a replacement. If you have data on that drive, then you might be able to retrieve some of the data before it is lost. A drive that is failing will more than likely burn out an entire sector at a time. A drive that is just experiencing drive failure will appear to be working fine, as there are still sectors that can be read, but they are not functioning properly. As for recovering lost data, I think you are better off buying a new drive and restoring the data there. At this point in time, the best alternative for recovering data that is lost on a drive that is experiencing drive failure is to buy a new drive. The drive manufacturer, however, will not honor the repair warranty if the failure was from a condition caused by errors in the drive. So it is important to check your drive status and get replacement drives if you find that your drive is showing bad sectors. Q: Using Python to read command line arguments I want to create a Python program that can take in some command line arguments. So for example, I create a program called foo and I can e79caf774b
