like you. You're the best of the best. The Game In this near future, the world is on the brink of chaos. The Central Bureau is the one body the world has to depend on to deal with it. They have built the Iron Brigade, an army of augmented soldiers with superhuman abilities. The Iron Brigade have proven their might and its time to try and stop the brigades. Brigades have been spotted everywhere, weapons are now more powerful than ever and the way to victory seems clear. You must now lead your own brigade and destroy the brigades before they destroy you. Game System Game System The Iron Brigade is a tactical First Person Shooter game. Each character in the game has an area of effect skill, which determines the size of a "blast". each of your units, a turn consists of movement and fire and the unit is rotated back into place to repeat the process. Every time you can rotate, you take a decision, which is a "Chance" to shoot, move and intercept. Depending on your "Chance" you will be awarded an extra "Hit" or "Miss". When you miss, a unit will take its current hit to become "Hurt", which will decrease your performance for the remainder of the turn. This is really important, so you will need to be aware of your unit's current state. In the pause menu you can see how many hits your units have taken and the current level. You will also have to monitor your health and ammunition. You have a stock of 30 energy "Cells" which fuels the different abilities in your units, When this is depleted, you will start to temporarily reduce your combat school without any trouble. When the intrusion was

Chris Parker was a student in his junior year and was taking law enforcement classes. Several students have reported that another apparent shooter was arrested a few hours after they heard shots while he was eating lunch. "During our time together, he was always caring, kind, and had a great sense of humor," Jan Parker says. "He just brought out the best in everyone. He always talked about his plans going into the '90s, like he always wanted to be a marine." Chris Parker's parents fear for their son's killer who has been allowed to go back into the community, despite the Sandy Hook Elementary School shooter having been apprehended within a day. "This guy got on a bus on Friday," one of the school's Parent Teacher Association (PTA) members says, "and left the parking lot. Did you follow him? He's back in his regular environment? Where is he being housed? Is he being watched?" Another parent adds, "The shooter is being allowed to live in a neighborhood where a lot of people used to do drugs and sexual activity. The school is a gateway to every neighborhood in town. The shooter can easily walk two blocks and kill again." The Parkers were comforted by the knowledge that their son died protecting other children, even though "When he was shot, he fell to the floor." The gun control debate, already bitter and charged in the aftermath of the Sandy Hook massacre, turned even more acrimonious last week when legislation designed to close the so-called "gun show loophole" was blocked by Republican Senators' thirteen votes in the U.S. Senate. Politicians on both sides of the aisle in Washington tend to use the school shootings, here and in the U.S. to push their constituents to line up behind their legislation.
