The Layers panel enables you to create, edit and organize multiple independent layers. The Image Editor has a history panel where older copies of the image can be viewed. The Image Adjustment panel has many functions for editing images including effects, levels, retouching and converting color. The Spot Healing tool attempts to automatically correct flaws in an image. The Quick Selection tool enables users to easily select an object in an image. The Selection Brush is ideal for copying and cutting images, while the Magic Wand selects image areas by color, brightness and contrast. Removing areas from an image with the Eraser, which behaves just like a Magic Wand but makes no selection, can be very useful. The Layer Comps palette can be used to merge two or more layers together and bring together their properties.

Using the History panel, you can undo or redo a single operation, and drag and drop multiple images in a single operation. The Brush tool sets custom paint strokes that are particularly useful for precise drawing. The Stroke dialog box can be used to adjust the size, color and opacity of paint strokes. The Blur and Sharpen tools can be used to remove or add texture to a layer. Using the Hue/Saturation dialog box, the color saturation of a layer can be adjusted. Using the Curves dialog box, the amount of contrast in a layer can be modified, along with its brightness and coloration. The Watercolor feature allows the user to gradually fill a layer with color. Layer masks enable the user to control the transparency of a layer. Photoshop's Filters can be used to add vignettes, grungy or glossy effects, spot color, or adjustments such as a grain or blurring effect. The filters are organized into collections.

The History panel lists all changes made to an image. Removing multiple objects from an image with the Quick Selection tool can be very time-saving. Copying and pasting the Stamp tool creates a clean selection that's perfect for cutting out objects from a

Temperatures could rise to 26C (79F) on Sunday, as the sun rises higher than expected in the middle of the day, according to the latest forecasts. From the start of 2016, the sunshine has been delayed, sometimes by hours, with the date of sunrise and sunset instead of around 11am and 3pm. The usually reliable Met Office weather forecasts say that temperatures in the north of Britain could top 20C as well as 26C, with extreme heat expected to be a major factor in Britain. The temperature in the south could reach 21C, with unusually strong winds. The latest forecast for the weekend, from the Met Office, said there was a 70% chance of sunny spells, with a chance of some showers over the weekend. Forecasters say the sun will be higher than normal in the sky, rising to 11.3 degrees later than normal on Saturday. It will rise to 9.5 degrees higher, on Sunday. One of the effects of this is that the sun will make more of an impact and its warmth will be felt earlier in the day, while it will reach lower in the afternoon. The temperature will be even higher in Scotland, where the overnight temperatures could reach 18C, with humidity ranging from 20% to 30%. The forecast for England and Wales means it will be one of the hottest weekends of the year so far, after temperatures rose to near 30C in the early part of June. Tom Chivers, Met Office head of long range forecasting, said: "It will be a very warm start to the weekend, but the forecast for the weekend looks as if a change will occur. There will be a period of higher pressure sitting over the UK, which will then be gradually replaced with another system coming in from the Atlantic, which will bring rain and cooler conditions." High summer temperatures will then return for a second time, he added. Meanwhile, anyone planning an outdoor barbecue over the weekend should keep an eye out for possible wildfires and enjoy it under cover. According to experts, barbecue grills can start as small fires that can quickly spread and burn crops. The Countryside Agency says the biggest threat is electrical accidents, but agricultural fires can be highly dangerous. "It is illegal for people to barbecue near a fire or near a structure such as a house, barn or shed. Farmers should be particularly cautious if they are working on land they have recently
