As doctors and patients increasingly use virtual reality, commercial VR headsets like the Oculus Rift (Facebook) and HTC Vive (Valve) are growing exponentially. Despite the fast pace of progress, one of the biggest barriers to adoption is price. The Oculus Rift sells for $399, and HTC Vive costs about $800. Either price feels excessive after you spend $100 on a gaming PC. The idea that VR headsets should be high-end, high-priced, is antiquated. It's absolutely essential that these headsets be affordable, and that means creative people, businesses, and patients from all walks of life have access to VR headset at a reasonable price. Rift and Vive might be the leading headsets, but their "Ludicrous Mode" isn't for everyone. V-Frame Goggles are high-powered low-cost headsets that can be used for VR. And if you've been a Rift or Vive user in the past, V-Frame Goggles are an upgrade. A Wireframe That Fits Leer's V-Frame goggles are named after the Red Arrow line of backpacks that totally convinced me to buy them. The V-Frame's build quality is solid, and it's comfortable to wear. But this is a big reason why so many VR users already have their own HMD. There are a lot of other uses for a VR headset, but this black and red design works well for gaming. Design-wise, the V-Frame Goggles look a lot like a driving visor. The goggles fold down to fit around the face, like a sports visor. The top of the headset is a transparent, sliding window that allows users to see a view of the world outside the headset. There's a slider on the left side of the visor that can be removed to allow for a wider field of view and maybe some panoramic in the future. These specs are close to the Rift's and Vives, with a 110 degree FOV and a 90-degree field of view.
