Numerous groundbreaking discoveries have led to improvements in catalysis and new catalytic applications. One such discovery was the introduction of transition metal coordination complexes, specifically rhodium and iridium transition metal coordination complexes. It was soon realized that these complexes were extraordinarily active and selective catalysts for hydrogenation, hydrotreating and hydroformylation reactions. However, one major drawback with the prior art is the high cost of preparing transition metal complexes, which has limited their use in commercial process applications. The usefulness of transition metal catalysts in a commercial process, however, does not rest solely in their performance, but also on their ability to be easily prepared. The economic feasibility of a process is often tied to catalyst preparation costs. The large energy consumption, catalyst handling, and b7e8fdf5c8
