You can buy and sell almost everything on eBay, whether it's a new gaming system or a new car. There are literally millions of items listed for sale on eBay and it's easy to get online and start browsing. However, not all items sold on eBay are listed by the original owners. This is where identity theft comes in. Whenever a buyer purchases an item on eBay, it is automatically logged into the buyer's eBay account. That's where identity theft can occur because someone could just switch identities on the eBay website using the buyer's login information. This could allow the identity thief to browse and search for your personal information or even to sell your personal information. eBay has gone one step further to protect its users, as well as the integrity of the auction process, and will soon require sellers to verify their identities. If an eBay seller doesn't provide proof of identity, their auctions will be automatically cancelled without the buyer being charged for the purchase. eBay has created a program called Identity Verification Program that will make sure that your eBay name and personal information are not sold and are not available for commercial purposes. They will require sellers to submit acceptable and proof of identity for verification. Enter your e-mail address to receive updates, promotions and more from eBay.
