by - ROBERT ELLIS I love the feeling of being transported into an interactive story. In my view, the MMO concept has been falling down in this area, and i absolutely love the steps Harebrained Schemes have taken for Elden Ring. It's a beautiful game that should be on every pc, and i'm sure many other gamers feel the same way. Let me start with the good stuff. The visuals look stunning. An exceptional mix of the modern graphical style and the retro feel that has been best seen in the Grim Fandango series. The character models are a pleasure to look at, although i'm not sure i need to mention it, because it's easily the thing that will strike you as most impressive first. The actual gameplay is only one step up, in my opinion. The fluidity of movement is simply outstanding. It works seamlessly across different actions like walking, sprinting, climbing up and down slopes, jumping, dashing forward, and performing a variety of rotations and more. And you don't even need to sit down. Tired arms are no problem because of the smooth and fluid animations. Everything is done so effortlessly that it's truly hard to comprehend. The gameplay feels as great as the graphics. There's a lot to do in this game. Many scenarios have a variety of different objectives, but all of them can be played in any order, so there are no barriers. Another fun element is that some of the NPCs have traits that allow you to interact with the game world in special ways. For example, you can offer a gift to a friendly NPC to give her money, and you can gain a favor from a rival NPC by fighting him. The crafting system works just like before, although this time there are some improvements. Instead of a crafting table, players get a catalog. Here, you can look at items, buy them, and then use them. However, instead of the menus that were only accessible by the mouse, this time there are buttons which you can click on. This works even better than before, because you can manage multiple items without worrying that they will be closed with just one click. The speed of the crafting is great, with everything taken care of in no time at all. In addition to the aforementioned mechanics, there's also a huge amount of collectibles and secrets, which is absolutely awesome bff6bb2d33
