VCs drive the economic, legal, and academic systems that surround their investments. The more money in VCs' coffers, the more loudly they talk about the business of venture capital, and the more than a few reporters are likely to listen. Even the coolest and most forward-thinking, tech-savvy entrepreneurs appreciate VCs' role. Surely, they do: the venture capital industry's power over how tech startups operate has been proven time and again. So, many entrepreneurs, such as those of Atrium Staffing, are pretty well-versed in the ways of the VC, even if they're not yet well-versed in the language of "venture." But, tech startups rarely sit back and let the VCs do the talking. They are often interested in shaping the conversations VCs have with reporters and decision makers.
