Edit: To answer the commenters: I am using either XBMC or Kodi on my Android. It is on the manifest.xml. More specifically, this in the code: I did not have to do this, as I do have a wired internet. As an example: If I visit IPTV Free, I will download the flash player automatically. If I leave the channel, I will be redirected to the site myTV provider. If I leave again, I get redirected again. I get out of my application, I am back on my site. If I pause, I go back to my application, and if I resume, I go back to my application. You know that when you watch a video in VLC, the flash player, the browser or other applications are used? When I pause, I turn off my internet. When I resume, I turn it on. A: I am pretty sure that your Android device will be redirected to the app provider's website if you try to visit a URL that is not included in your own application. Therefore, if you want to play videos from YouTube or similar services, you should probably either: Add the URL pattern (and the proper permissions) for the YouTube API (to request full credentials) in your own application's manifest file. You might also check for other URL schemes, but not sure which one to use. Make your own app that acts as a proxy in your application's activity. Make sure that you save the current state of your application (some sort of DB cache) so that you can restore it when your app resumes (to prevent the redirect to the provider's website). I know this is not the cleanest solution (and that I have done the same myself many years ago). The methods I previously mentioned are for playing streams or videos, not for download.
