related to antioxidant properties in primary cortical neurons. Repetitive injury to brain or a significant insult to the CNS might result in secondary insult caused by reactive oxygen species (ROS) that leads to oxidative stress. Oxidative stress could lead to neurodegeneration and neuronal death after the primary insult. Therefore, it is important to prevent secondary injury by decreasing oxidative stress in a short period after injury. In this study, we investigated whether Vitamin D has neuroprotective effect and its mechanism on primary cortical neurons after traumatic brain injury (TBI). Acute primary cortical neurons were harvested from C57BL/6 mice as an in vitro model of TBI. In the first experiment, we found the cell survival rate after vitamin D treatment in TBI condition. The second experiment was designed to investigate the ROS/antioxidant in the primary cortical neurons after vitamin D treatment in TBI condition. Primary cortical neurons were treated with vitamin D in TBI condition and the ROS/antioxidant were assessed. In the third experiment, we investigated whether the neurons treated with vitamin D in TBI condition had better cell survival rate, more ROS/antioxidant than the untreated TBI condition, and if the antioxidant property of vitamin D could prevent or decrease the ROS/antioxidant. In the third experiment, early treatment of vitamin D could not prevent the death of cortical neurons after the TBI insult
