one of the problems of this is that if we use several fonts, it may not be easy to know what font a user is viewing. for example, the same text may be displayed in one font, and another font in a different size. in the case of a website, the text may not be displayed properly. if we use a single font for all of the text, there is no issue. the only thing that bothers me about the font-face rule is that it is placed outside of a certain style sheet. the reason for this is that the font family is described in the style sheet, and this rule has nothing to do with fonts. for example, when you use font-family to describe the font, the browser will check whether the font is installed in the system. if it is not, the browser will ask the user to download it. there is no such thing as a font-family rule, but the font-family rule that i am speaking about is a font rule. the font rule also has nothing to do with the font-family rule. in the early days of css, the browser would download a font file to the computer even if the browser did not need to display that font, and the browser would use the file. because of this, browsers downloaded a large font file to the computer even though the font was not being used. as mentioned above, the purpose of web fonts is to solve the problem of downloading an unnecessary font. the @font-face rule is a standardized way to embed a font. creating font fallback is easy with css, because it is a matter of only putting in the appropriate @font-family property. the only thing you need to do is add in the required font-weight, font-style, font-size, and font-family. if the browser cannot find the font, it will look for a font with the same characteristics.
