a fair use is at copyright for assembly or, unless specially permitted by another copyright. in the policy notes, 'fair use' is set out in the us as the creation of a public copy of part of a newspaper to supplement another publication with information the newspaper has not legally but legitimately (what i like to call 'legit legally') misappropriated. this could include a translation of an article, though not of all the claims made in the article, and a creative reworking of the text to improve on the news value of the original. even in a dictionary, where the words can be copied, as in the case of the standard dictionary of the us government and its courts, any copies must be of the current edition. 'fair use' in the uk has an even narrower scope; more often than not, an artist has to be specifically granted permission by the copyright owner to reproduce the work, in which case the 'fair use' exception may not apply at all. in this country of freedom of speech and copying of works for purposes of 'fair use', copying material that has not been copied lawfully is as intrinsically illegal in the uk as it is in the us. any copying you do is potentially illegal unless 'fair use' is legal - this becomes an issue when those copying infringe the copyrights of others. you can't claim that you are copying in 'fair use' if you are not. fair use does not protect the copying of articles in newspapers, books or anything else that is licensed by copyright. all of this is covered in the copyright act, section 5, which of course had its birth in the us. the us copyright act has essentially been copied for this country, though it is not (yet?) in english, and has been translated into many other languages.
